“Nutrient-rich” is a good sign in food, but a warning sign in lakes. High levels of the nutrients phosphorus and nitrogen can contribute to excessive algae growth and rob water of its oxygen. EPA finds that at least 100,000 lakes have high levels of phosphorus and nitrogen. These lakes are more likely to have degraded populations of small aquatic creatures, like mayflies and snails, that are essential to the food web of lakes.